

1. Interview Feedback

For my observation, I asked someone who had never seen my website or heard the story before to explore the website on their own. Overall, they understood that the website was about my mom's childhood in Chongqing before the internet and how people communicated, read, watched television, and spent their everyday lives differently from today. The images and video helped them understand the historical setting and made the story more visual.

One part that was confusing was the section about letters. After the sentence saying that a letter usually took around ten days to arrive, I had a separate red line that simply said "Ten days." I originally used the repetition and red color to emphasize how long the wait was, but the viewer was not sure why "ten days" appeared twice. They also found the newspaper names slightly confusing because I wrote both the Chinese romanized names, "Chongqing Ribao" and "Chongqing Wanbao", and their English names. They suggested that I simply use Chongqing Daily and Chongqing Evening News.

I also noticed that the viewer did not immediately realize that the television media could be played. This made me realize that although the video had controls, its function could be clearer to someone seeing the website for the first time. The visual connection between the lianhuanhua and the television was also interesting because Journey to the West, a classic Chinese story, appears in both forms of media.

2. Revisions

Based on the observation and feedback, I made several changes to make the website clearer and easier to navigate. First, I revised the letter section so that "ten days" is no longer repeated as a separate statement. Instead, I kept it within the original sentence and used red, bold text to emphasize the long waiting time without confusing the reader.

I also simplified the newspaper section by removing the romanized Chinese titles and using only Chongqing Daily and Chongqing Evening News. This reduces unnecessary information for an audience that may not know Chinese and makes the paragraph easier to read.

For the television section, I made it clearer that the media is a video that the viewer can play by adding a short instruction to press  in yellow. I also clarified that the video shows an old black-and-white television playing Journey to the West. Finally, I revised the overall visual organization of the website. In the previous version, some section titles were red while others were a lighter color, and emphasized sentences also used different colors and sizes. This made the visual hierarchy feel inconsistent. I standardized the section titles and emphasized text so that the same colors and formatting have consistent meanings throughout the website. I also placed each section inside a separate bordered box, making it easier to distinguish where one part of the story ends and another begins. These changes make the website cleaner, more organized, and easier to scan and navigate.
